Explanatory note regarding image reproduction rights

Any person, regardless of their status, has an exclusive right to their own image (this also applies to their voice). In principle, it is not therefore permitted to freely circulate a photograph or video of a person without receiving their prior consent.

Thus, the reproduction of a person's image where the person is in a private location requires their consent due to the risk of violating their privacy. The same applies to a recognizable person on their own in a public location under circumstances relating to their private life.

Under exceptional circumstances, the right to information allows this principle to be limited to illustrate, for example, an event in the news.

Where the authorisation of the person whose image is reproduced is required, an unequivocal tacit agreement may suffice however, particularly for purposes of providing evidence, specific written authorisation is preferable; this also applies to minors.

Special conditions may also be arranged, such as the possibility of transferring the authorisation to use to a third party; a limited period of use with the possibility of renewing or tacitly extending; the field of use; a clause specifying that its use may not affect the reputation or private life of the person photographed; or a specific instruction relating to the reproduction medium (internet, paper, audiovisual, etc.).
